

I. READING

Harry Land is British, but he works at a university in South Africa and studies crocodiles. He describes his work with some of the most dangerous animals in the world.

I work in a team. We study the crocodiles' behaviour and look for their nests. We also watch their feeding habits, and weigh and measure them. We are looking for changes in their size or their habits in the last few years. We don't kill or hurt them and we try to make sure they don't kill or hurt us!

We catch crocodiles either with ropes or traps. We usually catch the smaller crocodiles at night from boats. We use a rope and pull them onto the boat. Then we immediately tie up their mouths. Crocodiles have got very sharp teeth! We also watch out for their strong tails. Some crocodiles are too big to catch in this way. Instead we use traps on land.

Crocodiles are interesting creatures, but they are also very frightening. Neither males nor females like humans, but females are especially dangerous. This is because mothers get very angry when people go near their nests. Luckily, they don't like large groups of people. I certainly wouldn't go near a mother on my own. I'm not brave enough! Small crocodiles have bitten me a few times and once a big crocodile charged our boat. That experience was really frightening. But, I've never fallen in the water and I never want to! On a hot day in the middle of a group of hungry crocodiles, you would really be in trouble!
